

QINHUANGDAO RED RIBBON PARK

Posted on November 30, 2016 by urbanNext

---

Categories: Architizer, Energy and sustainability, ka-au, Kongjian Yu, Low Density, Project, Territory and mobility, Turenscape, Urban Paradigms

Tags: Active Public Spaces, Built landscape, China, Citizen interaction, Controlling nature, Ecological activation, Ecological agencies, Ecological researches, Health contributor, Lack of Urban Health, Landscape Architecture, Natural connectors, Natural dialogue, Park, Project, Public space role, Renaturalizing city, Territorial Approach, Urban Health, Urban Paradigms, Urban pathologies

Against a background of natural terrain and vegetation, a "red ribbon" spans five hundred meters, which integrates the functions of lighting, seating, environmental interpretation, and orientation. While preserving as much of the natural river corridor as possible during the process of urbanization, this project demonstrates how a minimal design solution can achieve a dramatic improvement to the landscape.

The Qinhuangdao Red Ribbon Park used to be a neglected community garbage dump.

